

United States Court System

The U.S. court system makes up the Judicial branch of the government. There are three types of court: District Courts, Courts of Appeals, and Supreme Court. The job of the courts is to interpret laws made by the Legislative branch of government.

Fill in the blanks below with District Courts, Courts of Appeals, and Supreme Court

The top court in the United States.

There are nine justices that decide cases based on the constitution.

The second level of courts in the U.S.

When a person challenged the decision of a judge, the case goes to this court.

This court is the lowest level of U.S. courts. There are at least one in each state and a total of 94 in the country.

These courts are “trial courts” and they use a judge and a jury to decide who is right.

From top to bottom: Supreme Court, Court of Appeals, District Courts